HOAR DIES AFTER LONG ILLNESS

Took Defeat Coolly. Defeat did not disturb the equanimity Senator Hoar. He fought hard against te ratification of the Paris treaty, but heat the battle was over he met several waspaper men at the "galley" elevator of remarked with a bland smile: "Well, we've met the enemy and we are lers."

Published Autobiography.

Published Autobiography.

In November, 1903, Senator Hoar's "Autobiography, of 70 Years" was Issued. The two good-sized volumes, into which the venerable Senator from Massachusetts compressed the recollections of his mong career are a valuable and interesting contribution to the political history of the country, and the memoirs of his wide and often close acquaintance with the foremost meen of letters of his time have also furnished many delightfut chapters.

Some of the Country of the chapters. Some of His Characteristics.

Some of His Characteristics.

Some time before he died Senator Hoar was thus pictured by a friend:

"Any day &c can see parties of visitors gazing at Senator Hoar long and curiously and discussing him. They seem to come just to see Mr. Hoar, and when they have taken him into their hearts' content they steal silently away.

"But if these visitors knew that the venerable senator, who generally disappoints them in his physical appearance, reads genuine yellow-backed novels and lo-cent productions on the same order with all the avidity of a messeriger boy, perhaps they would gaze longer and with increased curiosity and wonder. For, truth to tell. Massachusettis' senior senator nejoys this form of pastime and refuses to be separated from it.

"Mr. Hoar's favorite time for reading these hair-raising productions is willo traveling. Whenever he has a railway journey of any length to make he carries with him a pile of literature of the "Deadwood Dick." "Red-Headed Ralph."

"The Ranger of the Roaring Rialto" type. He reads the suff through from the first to last and seems to get the keenest enjoyment out of the plots and impossible characters. And he likes nothing better than to discuss with his companions the curious working of the human mind that can covolve such stunations.

"But this is not Mr. Floar's only trait that amuses his colleagues. When he is in particularly good humor he keeps his neighbors in the Senate in a constant titter by his comments on the proceedings.

How They Gauged Him.

How They Gauged Him.

"His colleagues have a sure way of gauging his humor. It is by the manner in which he manipulates a bunch of keys that dangles from his fingers. When he is at peace with the world and everything is going smoothly with him. Mr. Hoar swings this bunch of keys with an easy, regular motion. If the swing should stop or become irregular, then there is a little trouble brewing in his mind.

"If he should tap the desk with his key, then it is known that the views exprossed by some one on the floor are displeasing to him. When he draws the keys up near his face and swings them in a circular motion, he is amused at his opponents. But when he sweeps the bunch through the air in a long curve his colleagues know that he is disgusted and about to take the floor to reply to some displeasing argument or to reproach the Senate for some proceedings not in accord with his ideas of propriety.

trolley car and go to the seashore at Gloucester, where they have a fish dinner. The cariodis of old fellows go from Worcester to Boston, where they remain over night. The next day they go to Gloucester, eat their fish dinner, return to Boston, and on the thrid day get back to Worcester.

"There are more of these Worcester cronies than of the senator's intimates in Washington, for this mild-mannered man, whose blue eyes beam so benignly through large spectacles, has not made many close friends in his public capacity. This is due to the fact that he wields a free lance in debate, and is as apt to wound a friend as a foe.

"He has a biting, sarcastic tongue, which more than once has made him personal enemies. These enemies call him selfish and disregardful of the rights and prerogatives of others. He is a great stickler for the forms and courtestes of the Senate as applied to others. He has a habit of lecturing the Senate on the proprietles, and this, too, has caused resentment.

Senator Hoar's resignation was mentioned to Mr. Ingalis the latter derisively exclaimed?

"Senator Hoar resign? Not much! When it comes to that point he will rise in his place and present the resignation of. Senator Dawes.

"As an orator Senator Hoar's gestures are few and ungraceful. He usually stands with the points of his shapers resting on the desk in front of bim, and as he grows emphatic he telters up and down on his toos, pumping out his words in a voice that is little more than a squeak. His most telling sentences and most chitting satire are delivered while he blandly surveys the Senate through his spectacles with the air of a good old church deacon gently admonishing his brethren.

"No one knows his limitations as a public speaker better than Mr. Hour himself, When a young man it was his greatest dread that he could never succeed as a pleader in the law because of his lack of voice. He never did have a full-toned voice.

His First Speech.

His First Speech.

"He had practiced law for several years and had been engaged in politics for quite a while before he was forced to make a public speech. During the free soil movement he found himself once on the platform where Wendell Phillips presided over a large and enthusiastic meeting. Phillips had addressed the crowd, and then there wore cries for 'George F. Hoar.'

"The young man's heart was in his mouth, but he was forced to the front and made his first public address. His thin, penetrating voice did not fall him and was sufficient to convey thoughts and expressions that aroused the intonse enthusiasm of the audience. Confidence came to him. and from that day he never hestitude to
